Richardson begins his year in the Kimberley region of Western Australia, where he witnesses the spectacular sight of millions of migratory shorebirds. He then travels to the Top End of the Northern Territory, where he observes the nesting behavior of the endangered Gouldian finch. As the seasons change, Richardson follows the birds south, visiting the rainforests of Queensland, the arid deserts of the Outback, and the temperate forests of Tasmania.

Along the way, Richardson encounters a wide variety of bird species, from the tiny fairy-wrens to the majestic wedge-tailed eagles. He also learns about the challenges facing birds in Australia, including habitat loss, climate change, and introduced predators. Despite these challenges, Richardson remains optimistic about the future of birds in Australia. He believes that by increasing our understanding of these fascinating creatures, we can help to ensure their survival.
