

Frank Merriwell's Son: The Enduring Legacy of Burt Standish

Frank Merriwell was one of the most popular fictional characters of the early 20th century. He was a young man of great athletic ability and moral character, and his adventures were followed by millions of readers in the pages of the popular pulp magazine, Tip Top Weekly. In 1919, Frank Merriwell's son, Burt Standish, was introduced to the world. Burt was a chip off the old block, and he quickly became a popular character in his own right.

Burt Standish was born in the town of Fardale, New York, the same town where his father had grown up. Burt's mother, Ruth Standish, was a strong-willed and independent woman who had a great deal of influence on her son. Burt's father was often away on business, and Burt was raised primarily by his mother and his maternal grandparents.

Burt was a natural athlete, and he excelled in football, baseball, and track and field. He was also a good student, and he was known for his intelligence and his quick wit. Burt was a popular figure in Fardale, and he was often looked up to by his friends and classmates.
