

The Italian Invasion of France: Mussolini's War of Conquest

On June 10, 1940, Italy declared war on France and invaded the country from the southeast. The invasion was a disaster for the Italians, who were poorly prepared and outmatched by the French army. The French quickly pushed the Italians back into their own territory, and the invasion was eventually called off.

The Italian invasion of France was part of Mussolini's larger plan to create a new Roman Empire in the Mediterranean. Mussolini had long been envious of the French empire, and he saw the war as an opportunity to expand Italy's territory and influence.
